

Volunteer with us

There are lots of short and long term opportunities to volunteer with FPNF at our project sites in Bali and Kalimantan. Volunteer positions include:

- working in a nursery or organic garden
- teaching English, art or sustainable farming to local communities
- planting and monitoring trees
- caring for animals at our rehabilitation centre
- writing grant proposals

Hundreds of people from all over the world have volunteered with FPNF, check our website for more details.

What We Do

We operate five sites across the Indonesian islands of Bali and Kalimantan. Our projects include wildlife care and rehabilitation, habitat protection, reforestation, the breeding and release of critically endangered birds, and environmental education.

FNPF also provides local communities with income generating opportunities – including eco-tourism and organic farming – reducing their need to be involved in environmentally destructive activities, such as illegal logging and palm oil plantations.

Using our holistic approach, we have transformed the island of Nusa Penida, off the coast of Bali, into a unique bird sanctuary, brought the Bali Starling, the island's mascot and one of the world's rarest birds, back from the brink of extinction, relocated dozens of orangutans to safety in Kalimantan, and improved the well-being of hundreds of people.

Who is FNPF?

FNPF is an Indonesian NGO working to protect wildlife and its habitat, at the same time supporting local communities.

Our projects, which respect the interdependence of wildlife, habitat and local people, have been internationally recognized by organizations such as the United Nations Development Programme, the Whitley Fund for Nature, and the Rainforest Action Network.

FNPF, which has its administrative base in Ubud in Bali, is known for its pioneering approach to wildlife conservation. We were set up in 1999.

We are a local and frontline NGO. We repeatedly demonstrate that we are cost effective, achieve results, and are transparent in the use of funds.
